

FURTHERMORE

The Washington Post January 13, 1996

FOOTBALL: The APBA Game Co. drew some snickers in September when it reported that it had played the entire NFL season on its sophisticated CD-ROM simulation, APBA Sideline Sports, and had come up with the Indianapolis Colts as the Super Bowl winner. Nobody is laughing now, except APBA executive vice president Fritz Light, who noted: "Despite the overwhelming odds, we predicted last fall that the Colts would get this far, which underscores how statistically accurate our simulation games can be. We're keeping our fingers crossed for this weekend." SKIING: The temperature climbed into the fifties, wiping out two World Cup men's sprint downhill in Kitzbuehel, Austria, and threatening races planned for the weekend. A full downhill is scheduled today, with a slalom Sunday. Toni Sailer, the former Olympic champion who leads the local organizing group, said he was hoping for a drop in temperature to help the machines make snow.

OLYMPICS: Heading off a potentially embarrassing incursion into business by a key sponsor's rival, organizers of the Atlanta Games said that Visa would remain the only credit card accepted for ticket purchases.

The agreement came during a meeting in Atlanta between top executives of Visa and the Atlanta Committee for the Olympic Games. Earlier this week, ACOG had disclosed that it was considering accepting other cards -- including rival American Express -- for telephone ticket orders. COLLEGES: Elected to George Washington athletic Hall of Fame were Bino Barreira (class of 1953), Marc Heyison (1984) and Michelle Knox Zaloom (1986). Barreira earned six letters as a football halfback and baseball outfielder. Heyison, a Springbrook High graduate, was an outstanding outfielder who went on to play in the Baltimore Orioles' organization. Zaloom, from South River High, earned seven letters, four in volleyball and three in crew, and went on to become an Olympic sculler. Induction ceremonies are set for Feb. 2 at the U.S. Botanic Garden Conservatory. . . .

When the Catholic University men's basketball team plays Rowan at 8 p.m. Monday at DuFour Center, spectators are asked to make a $3 donation to the American Cancer Society in lieu of tickets. The program was set up by Catholic Coach Mike Lonergan, who joined Coaches vs. Cancer after his mother died from the disease in June. Maureen Lonergan was athletic director and soccer and softball coach at Elizabeth Seton High School.

Copyright 2009 The Washington Post
<http://www.highbeam.com/doc/1P2-770758.html>

HighBeam Research is operated by Cengage Learning. © Copyright 2012. All rights reserved.
www.highbeam.com